

I'm not robot!

MJT to JPeto Dot Net 12 years ago I strongly recommend using the header (`$ _server ["server_protocol"]`; "404 not found"); instead of the heading ("http/1.1 404 not found"); I had great problems with an APACHE/2.0.59 (UNIX) responding to HTTP/1.0 while I (by chance) added a header "HTTP/1.1 200 OK". Most pages have been displayed correct, but on some of them Apache added a strange content to it: a 4-digit code at the top of the page (before any output of my PHP script), it seems to be a sort of checksum, because it is Page-to-page and browser changes to the browser. (Text code for the same page and browser) "0" at the bottom of the page (after the complete output of my PHP script) It took me some time to discover the wrong protocol in the HTC-Header. Marcel G 12 years ago several times this is asked on the net, but it was not possible to find an answer in the documents on Php.Net ... if you want to redirect a user and tell him that it will be redirected, e. g. "You will be redirected in about 5 seconds. Otherwise, click here." You cannot use the header ('Position: ...') as it is not possible to send any output before the headers are sent. So, either you have to use the HTML update thing or use the following: Hth someone dylan at wedefy dot com 14 years ago A quick way to make permanent or temporary is to use the `$ http_response_code` parameter in header ().
